(Re)Making Memories:
Navigating Coastlines in Valerius Flaccus' *Argonautica

As we follow Valerius' Argonauts on their bold voyage around the Mediterranean world, we are able to trace their course using references to coastal landscapes bordering the vast sea. In casting the Argonauts' great unknown in civilised and Roman terms, Valerius creates a paradox between the expedition's inherent journey and the established familiarity of the topographical features which these intrepid sailors use as navigational aids throughout their journey. These coastlines have been discussed in relation to their engagement with comparable etiological passages in Apollonius Rhodius' Argonautica (Manswald, 2014), to a discussion of Roman imperial expansion (Shew, 2014), and their place within Valerius' negotiation of his belated position within the epic tradition (Makranski & McGuire, 1993; Hershkowitz, 1998).

This paper will examine tensions between Valerius' use of these coastal markers as sites of poetic and ideological memory and crucial tools in the Argonauts' pioneering navigational acts. Using the catalogues describing the Argonauts' departures from Iolchos and Colchis (V Fl. 2: 6-20, 578ff; 3:178-205), I will demonstrate that the marginal positioning and problematic nature of these sites is closely linked with Valerius' presentation of navigation within the Argonautica, a self-conscious motif which, like the coastlines which inform its practice, negotiates complex themes of innovation and transgression. I will suggest that in exploring a major metapoetic trope within strict confines depicted by weighty indicators of the Argonautica's Flavian roots, Valerius is able to shape his poetic craft as a daring extension of established epic precedents. I will therefore show that, in addition to offering insight to literary and cultural traditions, through their central role in aiding the development of the epic's main narrative, Valerius' coastlines are renewed as important sites of memory by their interactions with his Argonautic navigators.
